

Law of rules, Aristotle and the state and the middle-class constitution

Albert Fiorino

A monograph to be released soon

Drawing upon my multi-disciplinary background, personal involvement in politics and much thoughtful reflection on the issues examined, I present a cosmic context within which to treat key political constructs which we have developed over the millennia and explore new options for their better use in our times.

The quality of our political dynamics is as old as humanity and history has clearly demonstrated that they will never markedly change. Their programming is very deeply embedded in our collective psyche. They are responsive, however, to the kind of choices we make in our lives and in the body politic. This permits us to tweak them in our favour to bring about more positive outcomes.

The time for such tweaking is now to counteract and hopefully prevail over the incessantly negative choices human beings make daily. In this way, each one of us can make a difference to the quality of the world order that we have, and that we may want to bequeath to future generations.
